Transition!

In keeping with the forward and ever-evolving movement of the Internet, we have transformed the format of PhotoStockNOTES to a Blog.

It's our hope this format will serve you even better and with more immediacy and involvement. We'll continue to bring you up-to-the-minute insights into the stock photo world, with opportunity for you to join in the communications if you wish, and hear what colleagues think of issues and their solutions to problems.

What's a "blog"? It's what you might call a continuing letter to colleagues, friends and others who are interested in keeping current or checking in on our mutual stock photography interests. Technically, a blog is a web page. (Web + Log = Blog.) This makes it possible to be interactive and to make comments on each item you choose to read.

This new path for PhotoStockNotes is a way of sharing and recognizing the way our industry is going. It continues the original spirit of PhotoStockNOTES by providing you with capsuled important information and "notes," and goes a step farther by offering you a chance to add your own "footnotes" to news and information and share in the footnotes of others in the field.

In the PhotoStockNOTES Blog you'll continue to benefit from useful updates on issues important to your photography – both the pluses and the minuses. We'll give you insights on how other stock photographers are grappling with going with the flow of the Internet. And we invite you to join in.
